Abstract:

In March 2006, the Mark Morris Dance Group celebrated its 25th anniversary with three programs at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.¹ The first program was devoted to Morris classics, including Gloria (1981)—the oldest piece in the MMDG repertory performed regularly to this day. It premiered on December 12, 1981, and was revised to its present form in 1984.² Morris has been both castigated and admired for his use of music; since 1994 he has received honorary doctorate degrees from several renowned music institutions, including the Juilliard School, and in 1996 he made a commitment to perform only with live music. This essay celebrates the anniversary of the MMDG by offering an

Abstract
A common strategic initiative of organizations engaged in electronic business (e-business) is the development of synergistic relations with collaborating value-chain partners to deliver their value proposition to customers. This requires the transparent flow of problem specific knowledge to partner organizations over highly integrated information systems. Transparent exchange of information and knowledge across collaborating organizations requires technological foundations for integrating business processes using software architectures built upon industry standards. The unambiguously interpretable flow of knowledge to inform online business processes is a challenging task with significant competitive benefits for organizations that take technical initiative. Infomediary organizations can serve the e-business need for exchange of knowledge and information through value-added knowledge services to participating firms in the value chain through intelligent software systems integrated with the Web Services Architecture. We define knowledge services as the

2. Suppliers communicate supply capabilities to the Infomediary.
3. Each Buyer receives information about suppliers that meet their criteria (i.e., match their demand function).
4. Each supplier receives information about Buyers that meet their criteria (i.e., match their supply function).

Figure 1. Infomediaries facilitate transactions between buyers and suppliers in e-marketplaces and become vital repositories of knowledge about transactions in the value chain.
