Title: "Perils," Past and Present

Peer Reviewed Journal: Y

Journal Name: Cultural Critique

Publication Year: 2006

Abstract: A special issue entitled "'Perils,' Past and Present" features articles that discuss the history of what is now the Democratic Republic of the Congo, drawing on a concept of "anti-imperialist nostalgia"; argue that Julia Kristeva's writings, which make a clear distinction between European "purity" and Balkan "danger," categorize the Balkans as the historic and cultural filth of Europe; examine the origins of the West German terrorist group, the Red Army Faction; discuss the role of religious fundamentalism in the current "conservative revolution" in the United States; contend that Lenin's theory of imperialism, which views war as an essential element of the capitalist project, is relevant to an understanding of globalization; and explain how Sax Rohmer's Fu-Manchu novels fashioned a powerful connection between racial identity and the various promises of 20th-century modernity.

REMEMBERING THE PAST'S FUTURE: ANTI-IMPERIALIST NOSTALGIA AND SOME VERSIONS OF THE THIRD WORLD

Jennifer Wenzel

ANTI-

IMPERIALISM: NOW AND FOREVER

--graffiti, twelfth floor, Butler Library, Columbia University, spring 2002

It may be more appropriate to put ourselves on guard against whatever new scheme may grow up to replace the three worlds than to congratulate ourselves upon having seen through modernization theory and the three worlds.

--Carl E. Pletsch, "The Three Worlds, or the Division of Social Scientific Labor, circa 1950-1975"

If the Congo did not exist, it would be necessary to invent it. Tune and again, whatever natural resource became indispensable to European capitalist expansion and technological innovation was to be found in the Congo in vast stores, beginning with slave labor in the sixteenth century. In the nineteenth century, the Congo had ivory, which, as Adam Hochschild notes, was like an expensive "plastic," capable of being carved into numerous items (64). Then, in 1890, wild rubber, ready for harvesting to meet the booming demand for tires, hoses, and electrical and telegraph insulation. In an era of electrification and industrial manufacturing, copper for wires and cobalt for alloys. At the dawn of the nuclear age, the uranium the United States used in the bombs that marked the transition from World War to Cold War. In the age of globalization, driven in part by telecommunications technologies that create what Arjun Appadurai calls "flows" and "scapes" across the borders of nation-states, the Congo has coltan, or columbo-tantalite, a heat-resistant conductor used in the capacitors that power cell phones, pagers, and laptops. The continued fluidity of the borders of what is now the Democratic Republic of the Congo is evident in the Rwandan- and Ugandan-controlled mining of this mineral. Given this series of developments, I'm tempted to trope further on Voltaire and wonder whether modernity and postmodernity could have been "invented" (or, indeed, 'conducted') without the resources of the Congo.(FN1)

Two things remain unsaid in this chronology: first, beginning with the slave trade, this "march of progress" has been achieved through the displacement and death of millions of Congolese. An April 2001 report commissioned by the United Nations Security Council found that coltan and other mineral piracy sustained the war in the Congo that has resulted in the deaths of more than three million people since

Research points to students' limited understandings of the way that information is organized, the way that results are returned, and the differences in search interfaces. Subject content knowledge, information skills, conceptions of how to determine relevance, and strategies for identifying useful keywords and forming queries are among the significant cognitive variables in student information seeking (Bilal & Kirby, 2002; Chen, 2003; Fidel et al., 1999; Nahl & Harada, 1996; Neuman, 1995)
