Title: History Is GlobalPersonal Author: Smith, WendyJournal Name: Publishers WeeklySource: Publishers Weekly v. 254 no. 45 \(November 12 2007\) p. 31

Publication Year: 2007

Abstract: The writer discusses David Levering Lewis's God's Crucible: Islam and the Making of Europe. The book presents an admiring view of al-Andalus, a Muslim-ruled Spain in which Arabs, Jews, and Christians intermixed easily and gained from a dynamic economy, but it also demonstrates the parallels between that civilization's decline and the contemporary situation. Lewis believes his book's themes of tolerance and the risks of fanaticism should be heeded today.

AUTHOR: CHARLES BATES

TITLE: When I Grow Up, I Want To Be In Manufacturing

SOURCE: American Machinist 151 no8 32-5 Ag 2007

A GROUP OF MIDDLE-school guidance counselors visiting the Institute for Manufacturing OFMIDDLE-Productivity prepared for lunch and seated themselves at several round tables adorned with white linen tablecloths. During the meal, they were told that the exceptionally clean room they were dining in was actually a machine shop. The counselors could not believe it because, like most people, they envision manufacturing facilities as dirty, oily and grimy. The Institute for Manufacturing Productivity and OEMs in the manufacturing sector want to change this perception.

The Institute for Manufacturing Productivity at York Technical College in York, S.C., is a facility whose mission is to produce a globally competitive workforce in the manufacturing industry for the benefit of local, state and national economies and for workers desiring to enter skilled, high-wage occupations. The Institute goes beyond the typical factory-tech-center concept. It represents a joint effort on the part of machine tool OEM Okuma along with the college and other manufacturing partners (see "Institute for Manufacturing Productivity partners" sidebar).

Recruiting is part of the Institute's functions, which is the reason that its first order of business was to invite in the middle-school counselors when it opened its new facility in May of 2007.

"We are going back as far as middle school to identify potential students and to help guidance counselors properly lead parents and students in choosing careers in manufacturing. Today's shops are clean and computer interfaced, and the work requires massive amounts of critical thinking skills," said William Beaver, director of the Institute for Manufacturing Productivity.

Okuma President and Chief Operating Officer Larry Schwartz and former York Technical College President Dr. Dennis Merrell developed the concept for the Institute. Okuma played a key role in shaping it and had members on the board of directors who helped determined how the facility should look and how it should operate. Based on the partnership concept, the Institute would be used for training and technology transfer.

The Institute offers both continuing education and credited programs, with about 60 credited students currently in its machine tool technology program and over 500 students going through its continuing education program per year. Credited students typically work toward a certificate, degree or diploma, while those in continuing education focus on quickly acquiring the skills and development hours for maintaining licenses, certifications and registrations.
